ABOUT THE SEMINAR

Equality is a foundational value of our Republic and strikes at arbitrariness. There is always need to address these inequalities and supplement the existing policies of reservations and remove discrimination by affirmative action. Constitution of India undertakes to establish a new constitutional order and to provide a vision on how to move forward to create a more equitable society. Or there may be a desire to update an existing constitution so that it will be more responsive to political, economic or social changes in society. Whatever the reason, a key part of any constitutional reform is ensuring the promotion, respect and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The expression "Social and Economic Justice" involves the concept of "Distributive Justice" which connotes the removal of economic inequalities and rectifying the injustice resulting from dealing or transaction between unequal in society. The constitution is at the centre of social and economic life of the country and defines the relationship between the State and the society, and between the different functions of the State. In times of democratic transformation, the constitution is a tool to introduce changes in social and economic life. Fundamental rights were largely in the nature of civil and political rights whereas directive principles were in nature of socio-economic rights. There is always the importance of socio-economic right in human development. Incorporating socio-economic rights at par with civil and political rights becomes difficult because of absence of enforceability. It is imperative upon State to respect the ideals and infuse these ideals into the living law of the land. There is need of an establishment of suitable enforcement of institution to enforce socio-economic rights so that socio-economic rights need not take shelter of civil and political rights for their enforcement.
